

In 1980 William O'Neil constructed an electronic audio device called "The Spiricom". O'Neil claimed the device was built to specifications which he received psychically from George Mueller, a scientist who had died six years previously. At a press conference on April 6th 1982, in Washington, D.C., O'Neil stated that he was able to hold two-way conversations with spirits through "The Spiricom" device and provided the design specifications to researchers for free. O'Neil's partner, retired industrialist George Meek, attributed O'Neil's success and the inability of others to replicate it, to O'Neil's mediumistic abilities forming part of the loop that made the system work. This composition is completely based upon the original recordings of O'Neil and Meek with Mueller through "The Spiricom", as source material.
